

2009-2010

B.A. in History/Social Studies

College of Humanities and Social Sciences

What Is the Study of History/Social Studies?

History is humanistic in its emphasis on the influence of ideas and values, its capacity to both instruct and entertain, and as interpretive literature. In its investigation of social processes, groups and institutions, and the examination of human motivation, it is a social science. It acts as a bridge among disciplines, borrowing from all and contributing a sense of context and sequence to the perception of actions and individuals.

Why Should I Consider This Major?

The past occupies a central place in how our society envisions itself. Therefore, the study and evaluation of the past must occupy a central place in our universities. While the study of History involves a careful search through existing evidence to determine what happened in the past—hence the common perceptions of historians buried deep in dusty archives—understanding how and why that evidence was created and then saved stands at that center of the discipline. Sometimes historians also ask why certain stories are retold or rediscovered. We are left with the task to discern what the evidence meant in its own time as well as in ours. To make those determinations, historians as a body draw from a wide range of influences, from the certainties of generalizations made within the social sciences to the uncertain complexities of the humanist-centered arts. The questions we ask and the critical commentaries we develop are as important as the answers we seek.

Secondary Education students who wish to be endorsed in Social Studies may choose this major. However, the History/Social Studies degree does not require that a student pursue a teaching certificate. History/Social Studies majors interested in Secondary certification must apply separately to the certification programs, such as those in Woodring College of Education.

How to Declare:

To declare a major, come to the department where you will be assigned an advisor. Students usually apply to Woodring in their junior or senior years.

Mid-Program Checkpoint:

Students intending to complete a Bachelor of Arts degree in History/Social Studies within four years should complete the following courses by the start of their junior year. Students are expected to fulfill all prerequisite requirements for courses and work with a departmental advisor as soon as possible.

Coursework:

Complete prerequisites for courses in major.

Complete at least three courses from HIST 103, 104, 111, 112, 113, 280, 281, or EAST 201 or 202.
